Dickie Dean: Doing the Little Things

At our father's funeral, my brother, Kent, and I listened to stories about him from a lot of people. Most of these lasting memories were of little things he said or did.

Dickie Dean hugged everyone while calling them a "sorry outfit." For some reason people thought that charming. Maybe it was the big grin on his face as he said it. I once heard a speaker at Harding say, "How you do anything is how you do everything."

And our father did everything with a warm embrace of others. Kent remembers him giving more of his personal time than anyone he's ever known.

Bill Barden, who spoke to my father the morning he died, told dad he couldn't count the number of ceiling fans and light fixtures he had installed for him. That if it wasn't for Dickie he would be sitting in the dark—hot.

Our daughter Larke remembers missing a chance to play in the rain because Grana made her put on raincoat and galoshes first. So Papa turned the water hose on and created another rain shower for her.

I cannot count how many times I heard the phrase "second parent" or "second family" at the funeral. Mourners remembered the hugs, playing pool, or the quiet support during a crisis. A woman who had grown up without a father remembers the Dean huddle group as her first model of a functioning family.

We all want to save the planet and rescue the world, but people remember the little things. Dad changed lives one light bulb at a time. The next extra five minutes, the next genuine smile or welcoming hug may be one of the most significant crossroad moments in someone's life.

Eternity can be decided in this very minute.

At our dad's funeral, with so many testimonials to his impact on others echoing in our hearts, Kent and I resolved to try to live up to the challenge of doing the little things. In my funeral remarks, I urged those in attendance to join us in doing one small thing for someone that very day, the way Dickie Dean would have done it for the very next person he met.

Because how you do anything is how you do everything.
