EGGS ANYONE? You may remember that year before last we raised chickens in our classrooms. With both of our schools on vacation we are getting over run with eggs. Our eggs are free range and organically fed. Because we don’t want to sell the eggs on Sabbath, if you will make a donation on our Vinmo account, I will deliver them to you on Sabbath. All proceeds go to support the Principals fund that pays for those extra it’s that may not be in our budget. Thank you for your support.

THE BITTERROOT FLOWER

The plant is native to western North America from low to moderate elevations on grassland, open bushland, forest in dry rocky or gravelly soils. Its range extends from southern British Columbia, through Washington and Oregon west of the Cascade Range to southern California, and east to western Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, northern Colorado, and northern Arizona.

Uses: The thick roots come into season in spring and can survive extremely dry conditions. If collected early enough in the season, they can be peeled, boiled, and made into jelly-like food.

History and Culture: The roots were consumed by tribes such as the Shoshone and the Flathead Indians as an infrequent delicacy. Traditionally, the Ktunaxa cooked bitterroot with grouse. For the Ktunaxa, bitterroot is eaten with sugar; other tribes prefer eating it with salt. The Lemhi Shoshone believed the small red core found in the upper taproot had special powers, notably being able to stop a bear attack. Plains Indians peeled and boiled the root prior to its consumption. Nlaka’pamux traditional knowledge holds that when saskatoonberry, chokecherry, and arrowleaf balsamroot start blooming, bitterroot is ready to be dug up and harvested.

The bitterroot was selected as the Montana State Flower in 1895.
