

What happens when our expectations of God collide with the reality of how He works? This message takes us deep into Matthew 11, where we witness one of the most surprising moments in the Gospels: John the Baptist, filled with the Holy Spirit from birth, the very man who baptized Jesus and saw the Spirit descend like a dove, sending messengers from prison to ask whether Jesus is truly the Messiah. Far from being a story of weak faith, this is a story about all of us. We all carry mental pictures of what God should look like, how He should act, and what He should do for us. When life does not match those pictures, doubt can creep in even for the most devoted among us. The message draws us into the tension between John's austere, separated life of holiness and Jesus moving freely among sinners and tax collectors, eating and drinking, breaking every mold John had constructed. The spiritual lesson is both humbling and liberating: our picture of God is often shaped more by our upbringing, our wounds, and our preferences than by who He actually is. The invitation is to approach Scripture with fresh eyes, allowing the real Jesus to replace the one we have imagined, and to hold onto faith even when He does not perform the way we expected.
