

What would it look like if God were writing a book about your life? That question sits at the heart of this message, drawing from the story of King Jehoshaphat in 2 Chronicles 19. Rather than staying comfortable in his palace, Jehoshaphat went out among his people, traveling from one end of the kingdom to the other, not to be admired, but to turn their hearts back to God. He appointed judges and reminded them that every decision they made was not for man, but for the Lord. The spiritual lesson here cuts deep: are we living lives that give God something worth writing about? We are challenged to move beyond the plateau that so many of us hit after our early enthusiasm for faith fades. The first months of a new believer's life are often the most fruitful in terms of influencing others, and yet over time we tend to settle into comfort, routine, and self-focus. Jehoshaphat's example calls us to ask honestly whether we are still seeking God with the same hunger that once defined us, and whether we are actively helping others draw closer to him as well.
