REVIEW last week:

Summary

In a world that constantly pulls our attention toward politics, economics, and the daily grind of life, this sermon draws us back to a central and urgent truth: the Christian's hope is anchored not in the systems of this world, but in the promised return of Jesus Christ. We are reminded that the Old Testament prophets searched and inquired carefully about a salvation they would never personally witness, yet they faithfully pointed toward it anyway. That salvation is ours. The angels marvel at it. And the question posed to us is whether we are living in light of it. Peter's repeated emphasis throughout his letter on the 'revelation of Jesus Christ' is not accidental. It is a deliberate pastoral strategy to reorient suffering, distracted, and world-weary believers toward the one event that changes everything.

Key Points

- The Old Testament prophets spoke prophetically of Christ's sufferings and subsequent glories without fully understanding who or when they were describing, and their prophecies were ultimately for the benefit of New Testament believers
- Angels themselves are fascinated by God's plan of redemption and rejoice over every sinner who comes to faith in Christ, though salvation is not available to angels
- Peter repeatedly directs suffering believers back to the same central truth throughout his letter: their hope is to be fully and completely set upon the revelation of Jesus Christ at his second coming
- The book of Revelation is best understood not as a strictly linear chronology but as a cyclical series of visions, each approaching the same climactic event — the revelation of Christ — from a different perspective, which explains the variety of eschatological positions held among sincere Bible-believing Christians

Key Passages of Scripture:

- Titus 2:11-13
- Acts 1:6-11
- 1 Thessalonians 4:16-17
- 2 Thessalonians 1:4-10
- 1 Corinthians 15:50-52
- Matthew 24:29-31
- Matthew 25:1-13
